Not illustrated. 1917 Excerpt: .in systematical pharmakotherapeutical science was the survivor. The sick people cry for pharmakotherapists. If the universities and colleges disappoint the public need, the professional periodicals have to teach pharmakotherapy and to proselyte some zelotic surgeons. The Western Medical Times is taking the first step in this di rection. For a modern scientific physician it is insufficient to enliven the old pharmakotherapy of the five thousand years past. It may be understood by parallelism. Soaps have been manufactured and used in the time of old Roman emperors and soaps are still manufactured and used today. The old Romans found different fats or oils and different wood ashes use ful for soapmakers. By an empiric way they had to search new formulas for every new material used. The modern soapmaker asks the chemist for an analysis of the fatty materials and the alkaline materials and calculates as the results of these analytical figures the exact amount of every material needed and of expected finished products and, furthermore, of expected useful by-products sooner than he starts making the first lot of soap. The old-time pharmakotherapist had the same empiric viewpoint as the oldtime soapmaker. Both tried. Sometimes they were lucky, sometimes they failed. The modern medical survivor, the surgeon, with his singular and curious prescriptions, persists in the same old fashion. The Western Medical Times will try to teach a judicious pharmakotherapy founded on intelligent chemistry. We expect the scientific level of a modern pharmakotherapist not being lower than...
